Dr Hans Egli's 100th birthday

Dr Hans W Egli, doyen of the Swiss community in the UK and one of the most distinguished Swiss to have made his home here, celebrates his 100th birthday on March 17.

Readers who would like to congratulate him on having reach his centenary should write to him at 6a Rodborough Road, London NW11 8RY.

Protesters halt Swiss trials in UK of disease free sugar beet

Plans by Swiss chemical giant Novatis to grow genetically modified crops in Britain have suffered a severe setback after protests by environmentalists.

Novatis and the world leader in GM food production, the American multinational Monsanto, had started the trials on two acres of land at Kirby Bedon near Norwich. But they decided to call a halt after a three week 'crop squat' by green activists.

The trials were of sugar beet that had been genetically modified to make it resistant to a weedkiller. They were being carried out in fields owned by the Lord Lieutenant of Norfolk, Sir Timothy Colman.

Environmentalists fear that GM crops could pass on their characteristics to wild plants and in so doing could create mutations that might devastate the countryside.

Commercial farming of GM crops has not yet been approved by the UK government.

Dreifuss presidency finds favour in UK

The election of Ruth Dreifuss as Switzerland's first woman president has attracted much approval from commentators in Britain.

The Times noted that in ordinary circumstances the formal election of the Swiss president would not be the cause of much international interest, and would not even be the subject of enormous enthusiasm within the country itself. But the election of Ruth Dreifuss was different.

"As a woman and a Jew she is an extremely unusual figure in Swiss politics," wrote The Times leader-writer. "At home it is her gender that adds significance to her symbolic post. Her religion also affords Switzerland an additional opportunity to draw an overdue final line under controversies that have badly damaged her standing abroad."

It went on to say that while the Swiss were famed advocates of decentralisation and direct democracy, in one respect Switzerland ranked last among developed nations, only conceding votes to women at national level in 1971, while Appenzell Innerhoden resisted female franchise in local elections until 1990.

The Times added that the Dreifuss election was also a proud moment for Switzerland's small Jewish community.

It had been caught in the crossfire in the dispute between Swiss banks and those acting for concentration camp victims and their families whose assets were improperly retained after the Second World War.

"Switzerland's complacent and insensitive attitude at the outset of this argument turned international opinion against her," said The Times, adding that the deal finally reached "remains vulnerable to assault from some Jewish critics who think it inadequate in scope and shape and also from a nationalist backlash in Switzerland."

While admitting that in her role of president Ruth Dreifuss would have little direct influence over this issue, "she can become a powerful symbol of Switzerland's willingness to deal with its past.

● Mancunians have long boasted that "What Manchester thinks today the rest of the world thinks tomorrow."

So it is not surprising that members of Manchester Swiss Club point out that it was back in 1993 that they elected the first woman president in their nearly 150-year history.

Mariann Reutter filled the role for three years, and was followed by another woman president – Odette Scheiwiler.

Charles leads the Brit invasion

Swiss ski resorts started the year by playing host to an impressive collection of international celebrities, with Prince Charles as usual attracting the largest number of paparazzi.

For his traditional week in Klosters he was accompanied by his son Prince Harry, for whom it was his fifth visit there. Each year he has added to his repertoire – from tobogganning to slalom and snowboarding.

The 50 photographers who followed him on his first day on the slopes were given an impeccable demonstration of snowblading, including a spectacular jump.

Meanwhile British football manager Roy Hodgson was in St Moritz, rubbing shoulders with the Grimaldi, Heineken, Furstenberg and Bismarck families, not to mention Italian industrialist Gianni Agnelli, Greek shipper Niarchos and German publisher Burda.

Crans-Montana has welcomed a new resident, Roger Moore, who has now left Gstaad and his near neighbours Blake Edwards and Julie Andrews.

Visitors to Villars have included David Coulthard and Phil Collins. And the slopes above Verbier have seen that celebrated ex-member of Britain's royal family, the Duchess of York, making her annual return to the resort where she used to be a chalet girl in the Eighties.

Then more than half the visitors were from the UK. Now they down to just 7 per cent, with Swiss skiers accounting for 57 per cent.

Otto Hartmann dies at 69

The Swiss Club Edinburgh has sadly announced the passing of its founder, Otto Hartmann, at the age of 69.

Club secretary Ursula Ross writes: Otto and his wife Peggy came to Edinburgh in 1957. Together they established the Royal Mile Boutique in the heart of the old town. As well as selling a range of superb Scandinavian style furniture, furnishings and artefacts, it included a small café where one could relax and eat delicious cakes which reminded one of home.

He was a professional ahead of his time, an 'avant-garde' designer, creating interiors of distinction. He also delivered lectures on interior design at what is now Napier University.

In November 1960, along with another five Swiss living in Edinburgh, he founded the Swiss Club. First the Boutique, and later the Design Centre in Hanover Street, became the focal points of the club.

With his talent for story telling and keen sense of humour, both Otto (or Murdo as he was affectionately known) and Peggy always made us feel most welcome. We have many very fond memories of companionable evenings and club outings, full of laughter, music and song, led by Otto and his accordion.

In 1968 he was appointed Consul of Switzerland for Scotland. He carried out this office with great compassion for his compatriots. Whether it was translating the wedding ceremony for a pair of young 'runaways', giving support to a man facing charges in court, or an au pair in distress, it made no difference to him.

He dealt with problems brought before him with understanding and a keen interest in human nature, making each person feel at ease and cared for. Otto resigned from his post in 1980, enabling him and his wife to fulfil their dreams of extensive travel. They returned to Edinburgh periodically to visit their daughters and grand-children. But in recent years health problems prevented them from travelling. Giving up their residence in Spain, they eventually settled back in 'Auld Reekie'.

The much loved husband, father, grandfather and friend is greatly missed by all. We extend our sympathy and condolences to his family and friends.

Are head teachers really necessary?

In the last issue of Swiss Review we told how members of the House of Commons Select Committee on Education had been on a fact finding visit to the cantons of Zurich and Aargau. Their aim: to discover why Swiss pupils did better than English children in maths.

One big surprise for the MPs came when they were told that Swiss schools didn't have head teachers.

They also found that education was the responsibility of the cantons, and that therefore it was not accurate to talk about 'the Swiss educational system.'

In their report afterwards the MPs said: "We were told several times during our visit that Switzerland has 26 educational systems, one for each canton. The role of the federal government is extremely weak."

They found that schools were much smaller than in England. The result was that there are more schools per head of population than in the UK, and that most children go to school on foot.

The classes are smaller, too. The class sizes of the ones they visited ranged from 18 to 22 pupils.

In marked contrast to many schools in the UK they found there was no noticeable security and that access to all parts of the school was completely unfettered. They found they could go straight to the class they wanted to visit.

The schools visited by the MPs were: Schulhaus Oescherf (Zollikon), Schulhaus Grabenstrasse (Schlieren), Schulhaus Kirchweg (Aargau), Schulhaus Fahrweid (Fahrweid) and four in Zurich: Kindergarten Au Luchsgraben, Schulhaus Apfelbaum, Schulhaus Dölttschi and Kindergarten Dölttschi.

One of the main differences between the Zurich and English systems was that one teacher would remain with the same class for several years, teaching them a range of subjects, which helped to reinforce a close relationship.

How British MPs joined the debate now raging among Swiss parents

At one school they were told that one of the main reasons truancy was very rare in Swiss schools was that the children in each class 'lived with the teacher' for three years. If they didn't turn up for school the teacher would call their home.

"This relationship with the pupils and the home was a key part of the school ethos, of which the teachers were proud," said the MPs.

But it was the absence of head teachers that puzzled them most. They found that one reason why schools in Zurich hadn't needed heads in the past was that schools were expected to do less.

"There is not the administrative workload created by national testing, or by Ofsted inspections. Things like school budgets and maintenance are dealt with by the local authority rather than the school.

"The prime task of the school has been to provide teaching in the classroom, where the individual teacher has great autonomy. In the words of one teacher: 'We are all head teachers in our own classroom'."

However, changes are now afoot in Zurich. The canton is piloting a new system of school organisation that includes the introduction of a post similar to that of head teacher.

A proposal, they found, that was arousing much debate among both teachers and parents.

The MPs said at the conclusion of their visit: "The discussions we had with teachers and others made us think about possible alternative models of school organisation. It is always useful to be reminded that the way we have always done things is not automatically the only way to do them.

"And having to answer the question: 'What do head teachers do?' was of course highly stimulating."

A Swiss owned company with 20 years experience in London. Specialising in International removal of household goods worldwide. Please ask for the manager Mr Arthur Bolliger.

One of London's most picturesque pubs, the Red Lion in Mayfair, will see an invasion of middle-aged and elderly 'students' in May when members of the celebrated Zofingia Society arrive in the capital for what is now an annual get-together.

The society, founded in Zofingen in 1819, is Switzerland's oldest student fraternity. It is active today in eight of the nine Swiss universities and in the grammar schools of Aarau, Lucerne and St Gallen, as well as Zofingen itself.

With 400 active members and more than 3,000 'Old Zofingians', its ranks have included some of the most illustrious names from Swiss history as well as today's leaders in politics, culture, science and the economy.

Today more and more students spend a semester abroad, or after competing their studies decide to find work in a foreign city. For many London is a favourite destination.

So one Old Zofingian, Dr Paul Leutenegger, who shares his time between Zurich and Kingston-on-Thames, came up with the idea of creating a meeting place here, in the form of a permanent 'Stamm'. The Red Lion, just behind the Dorchester Hotel, proved an ideal location.

But if you have a 'Stamm' you need a 'Stammtisch', a carved table round which members can socialise. There is now one in the Red Lion, with Swiss flowers and a map carved by Claudia Girard of Neunkirch (SH). On the wall are pictures of Swiss universities and cities, the work of Dr Robert Develey, who is responsible for the lanterns at the annual Basle carnival.

London pub becomes UK base for the oldest Swiss student fraternity

The Red Lion's lanterns and the coats of arms have been made in St Gallen with the help of the OZ president there, Dr U Wildhaber.

The inauguration was last May, when 150 people came to London from all over Switzerland and many parts of Europe.

Welcoming them were Dr Leutenegger and another OZ resident in London, Dr Martin Frischknecht. Guests included Professor Blankart from Berlin, Oscar Uhler from Nice and Wilfried Groote from Monaco.

Among the many visitors from Switzerland were Edouard Chollet from the Yvorne vineyards, and ETHZ engineer Jean-Noel Chapuis from Vevey, who next August will be presiding over his own great wine cellar to host visitors to the Fête des Vignerons.

The three day programme for this year's event includes visits to Cambridge University, the London Stock Exchange, the Institute of Directors and the Royal Institute of British Architects.

In the meantime Old Zofingians have turned the Red Lion into a home from home, meeting there every month and enjoying the hospitality of landlords Greg and Pauline Peck.

Paul Leutenegger notes with glee another of the pub's distinctive features: a copy of the day's Financial Times displayed at eye level in the gents' toilet.

'Read the book and make a friend'

This is the autobiography of a distinguished composer, musician and lecturer who is also Scottish, British – and Swiss. He is a member of the Association Suisse des Musiciens, but it would take more than half a page to cite all his achievements, distinctions, hon doctorships and memberships.

Sir David Lumsden, principal of the Royal Academy of Music in London, in an appreciative foreword, predicted that to read the book was to acquire a friend. Having read *Musical Chairs, I could not agree more.

Robin Orr was born in Aberdeenshire on June 2, 1909, the son of a skilled craftsman who even built an organ for their home.

He describes his childhood and school years with great perspicacity. At public school he decided that his career would be devoted to music, and started studying at the Royal College of Music when he was barely 17. He worked hard and in 1929 competed successfully for an organ scholarship at Pembroke College, Cambridge. That was where his relationship with Cambridge began and where, many years later, he was appointed professor of music. As a composer he faced difficulties like many other young musicians. Short of money, he became a music master in Somerset, and later in Yorkshire. His first success as a composer came when Sir John Barbirolli gave the first performance of his Three Songs of Innocence.

He wrote more than 50 works including, when he was nearly 80, a commission by the BBC for his Sinfonietta Helvetica, to mark the Switzerland's 800th anniversary 1991. By then he was a citizen of Zurich. In 1972 he was made a CBE in the Queen's Birthday Honours, and this was followed by many more honourable distinctions. In 1976 he became a member of the Welsh Arts Council and director of the Welsh National Opera. In Cambridge, during a university lectureship, he got to know many famous personalities, including Benjamin Britten and Peter Pears who commissioned four romantic songs. His reputation as a composer grew ever more. Lecture tours took him to the USA and many other countries, but Scotland, Cambridge and Switzerland never lost his affection.

His second wife is Swiss – Doris Winny-Meyer, art historian and resident in Britain since 1946. No doubt she was largely responsible for fostering his love of Switzerland. And it was in Klosters that he finished his autobiography, describing the early morning scene through the eyes of an artist: "I shall soon be making the large pot of tea, with which we pass the first hour of the day, and all is well."

Yes, Robin, I have made a friend. Your life story is written in a most arresting style, a marvellous tapestry of words, weaving in and out personal experiences, ancient truths, comic tales and sensitive insight.

Happy 90th birthday, and many equally happy returns.

* Musical Chairs is published by Thames Publishing, 14 Barlby Road, London W10 6AR. Price £12.50 plus £1.50 p&p.
