Thoughts at Easter

In our January issue a New Year's resolution was made to improve our daily conduct towards our fellow men. With one quarter of the year already past and with the approach of Easter—a time of meditation and good thoughts—it would be timely to examine ourselves on what progress we have made in regards to our resolution. Such a review is important if we want to take it seriously.

One of the best rules in every relationship with another person is practising courtesy. Courtesy has a calming and tranquilising affect on the receiver as well as the giver; it makes us feel better and this good feeling is reflected in our work and everything else we do. Many a traffic accident could be avoided with just a little bit more courtesy. If we earnestly practice it over a period we won't be annoyed at people cutting in on us at times when we think we should have had the right of way.

There are many other ways to improve our daily conduct towards others, however; we might get further by concentrating on one virtue at a time, instead of wanting too much and getting nowhere. So, for the time being, let's examine our conscience and if we have not already practiced it, start right now.
