Laugh a little . . .

“What a pity that your wife cannot make use of her chemistry degree.”

“You are wrong my dear chap, only yesterday she managed to transform perfectly a calf’s liver into charcoal.”

Smith sits at the window and calls to his wife: “There goes the woman with whom Jones is madly in love.”

The wife drops a cup, tips over a lamp and upsets the bowl with the goldfish in it as she races to the window. “Where, where?” she pants.

“Over there, the woman in the tweed coat.”

“You idiot, that’s his wife!”

“Yes of course,” the husband replies mildly.

The wife says to her husband: “Imagine, one half of the world does not know how the other half lives.”

“Don’t be upset,” replies her husband, “It is not your fault.”

Badly limping a man comes to the surgery, sits down sighing and shows the doctor his shin-bone. By jove, says the doctor, you certainly have some beautiful bruises on that leg. I suppose that comes from playing soccer?

No, from “Jasse,” says the patient.
