There must have been some twenty-five thousand people at the Crystal Palace last Saturday, when the London branches of the League of Nations Union held their second Festival of Youth. It was a very successful function from more than one point of view. Thousands of children and youngsters gathered in friendly competition and—I should like to emphasise this point—in wonderful co-operation, too, to make the festival the success it was. A Children's Choir of over two thousand voices is no child's play but represents, if it is able to produce such full musical effects as it did, an enormous amount of work. And everyone of the children will remember that work and the applause earned and received, all through life. And with it, all those children will remember the
