some strange places, but here was something fansome strange places, but here was something fan-tastic, incredible. One house contained neither tables nor chairs, and only a very primitive bed, yet it was filled with gleaming brass work — lamps, plates, candlesticks, and so on, which a woman was affectionately polishing. And next door conditions of the utmost poverty apparently prevailed, with the people of the house in rags, and their home itself falling into terrible decay. Yet on a table in the corner stacks and stacks of coins were piled. coins were piled.

By this time the fun was just beginning. All the five hundred inhabitants had heard of my arrival and had turned out in force to pester me. All visitors are molested in this way. Crowds of seemingly impoverished folk follow you along, pleading for alms, although Stein is one of the richest villages, for its size, in all Europe.

richest villages, for its size, in all Europe. Strangely enough, the misers do not quarrel among themselves nor covet each other's posses-sions. They seem to have strong communal in-stincts. But at the present day they cannot in-crease their wealth, try how they will. They posses flocks and herds, and an abundance of timber, but these things are worse than useless. Neighbouring towns will not deal with them nor buy anything of them, for they suffer continually from the depredations of the misers. Ragaz, in particular, suffers much from the pillaging of door-knobs and brasswork and iron railings. There is a story of a motorist who parked his car in an outlying lane, and when he returned found that it had been converted into scrap metal, every-thing easily portable about it having disappeared. that it had been converted into scrap metal, every-thing easily portable about it having disappeared. That may seem a tall story, but knowing Stein and the misers I can well imagine it to be true. Even a neighbouring church has to keep its altar ornaments locked up for fear of the pillagers.

And when the local tax collector visits Stein, is invariably accompanied by ten Swiss soldiers !

A CONVENIENT LONDON HOTEL.

The Gower Hotel, next to Euston Square Station, London, N.W.1, is quite remarkably situated from the point of view of accessibility to visitors arriving in London from the north and west, being only a few yards from the main thoroughfare joining King's Cross, St. Pancras, Euston, Marylebone and Paddington stations. The entrance is in George Street, off Euston Road.

The hotel, which has been established many years, is owned by the Kengor Syndicate, Ltd., of which Mr. Noel Hammersley is Chairman and Managing Director, and is managed by Mr. Edward Brullhardt, who is assisted by Mrs. Brullhardt as manageress, and by their daughter as bookkeeper. The hotel is popular and well equipped, and its amenities include, besides the restaurant and lounge, etc., a Masonic room which is the regular meeting place of several lodges, and a billiard room housing two full-sized tables by Thurston.

tables by Thurston. Mr. Brullhardt was formerly manager of the Albemarle Hotel, Brighton, and his London hotel experience before going to the Gower Hotel in-cluded two years at the First Avenue Hotel, and two years at the Piccadilly Hotel. His early training and experience were acquired in hotels in Switzerland and other parts of the Continent. Mrs. Brullhardt is sister of Mr. R. C. Vaughan. Hotel Review.
