SKIING CONDITIONS IN SWITZERLAND.

Conditions for winter sports have further improved during the past days as from 12in. to 24in. of snow have fallen above the 3,000ft, level. Above that height snow is from 2ft. to 3ft. deep and powdery, so that conditions for skiing are excellent in all the Swiss resorts. Although the temperature is not very low — from 31deg. to 17deg. Fahrenheit — skating is good everywhere.

HOSPITAL CARS OF THE SWISS FEDERAL RAILWAY.

The Hospital cars of the Swiss Federal Railways are veritable hospitals on wheels. The section for the sick passengers occupies the centre of the car; adjoining on either side are a room for the physicians, two compartments for nurses and other persons accompanying the patients, an electric kitchen with refrigeration and other equipment and medicine cabinets, linen closets, etc. are other conveniences, GRISONS.

With the death of Pater Maurus Carnot, at the age of 70, the canton of Grisons loses one of its most distinguished writers. Pater Carnot was born in 1865 at Sammaun (Grisons), he entered the cloister of Disentis in 1885 and was for over 50 years a teacher at the convent school. He was the author of numerous novels and plays, as well as the editor of the "H Pelegrin."

The Davos section of the Swiss Alpine Club has decided to equip Kesch Hut, 8,655 a/s, on Piz Kesch, with a telephone. Practically all the important points of view in the vicinity of Davos can now be reached by telephone. This includes the hostelry on the top of the Weissfluh, 9,337 feet a/s, the Parsenn Hut, 7,349 feet a/s, also the upper stations and restaurants of the popular new Davos-Parsenn cable railway. Skiers running down the Parsenn-Prättigau routes find telephones at various rest points. Telephone service is also available on the Strela Pass, in the new Vereina House, on the Silvretta and other famous haunts in the Davos-Klosters mountain region.

The new skating rink pavilion at Davos was inaugurated recently and spells the last word in modern conveniences and equipment. It is a truly palatial structure, solidly built of native fir, which in the Davos climate lasts almost forever. The surface of the outward walls is an intricate scale of hundreds of thousands of small shingles of yellowish tinged wood and the whole exterior presents a striking individuality. The name Davos appears twice and the intitials I.S.C.D. (International Skating Club, Davos) once on the facade in large letters of red eternite, the same material being used for a large clock-dial and its lands, and for a time-indicator facing the ice-hockey stadium. The latter will show the timing of the periods of the gante in progress. In the interior there is unobtrusive beauty everywhere.

CESAR ROUX †.

By the death of César Roux at Lausanne on December 21st, at the age of 77 years, international surgery loses one of its most remarkable figures. Born in 1857 at Mont-la-Ville in the Jura, Roux remained all his life a Vaudois in speech and sympathies. He learned his surgery under Theodor Kocher at Berne and soon came to excel his master in speed and ingenuity. At the age of 30 he was placed in charge of the surgical service at the Lausanne Hospital and five years later became professor of surgery in the University. Though he wrote almost nothing he was a great innovator in surgical technique, and Lausanne soon became a place of surgical pilgrimage. Behind this professional achievement grimage. Behind this professional achievement was a human being of singular attraction. "Though almost dwarf in stature," writes one of his old pupils, "César Roux had a tremendous personality. His great dexterity, shrewdness, and above all his innate kindliness, inspired unbounded affection and admiration in those who were fortunate to know him; though his devoted consistent and students could be rooted with terror. were fortunate to know mm; though ms devoted assistant and students could be rooted with terror at his seathing tongue. His energy was amazing: he taught daily for two hours at 7 a.m. in summer and 8 a.m. in winter to a packed audience in the demonstration theatre. His essentially practical teaching was hampered by a system whereby the ward work was almost entirely postgraduate. From the students Roux expected common sense and common observation; the mon sense and common observation; the man with extensive text-book knowledge but devoid of the principles of clinical examination was apt to have a bad time when first called in to examine a case in the theatre. And Roux's teaching was not a thing to be forgotten. He used to enrich our poor experience with Rabelaisian anecdotes, with chalked diagrams which seemed to grow in the round, and with a magnificent opportunism. One night the with a magnificent opportunism. One night the electricity of the whole town failed; next morning at 8 we were shown the living remnant of the workman who shorted the circuit."

at 8 we were shown the living remnant of the workman who shorted the circuit."

He was firm and gentle with all patients, reserving his irritation for his assistants — whose efficiency was in fact normal. Roux was himself fearless, honest, and quite intolerant of meanness; it is said that when a distinguished colleague who called him in consultation to Paris suggested sharing his fee Roux agreed at once, adding that his railway fare was 50 francs and his fee 5. A casual acquaintance, meeting him in the street and angling for a free consultation, was told to close her eyes and open her mouth, when Roux slipped away and left her gaping on the main bridge of Lausanne. His home was entirely pleasant to visit; his wife, a fellow-student from Berne — one of many expatriated Russian Jewish intellectuals — was an admirable hostess. There were two brilliant daughters, a physicist and a surgeon, a former much-abused assistant. Roux's thick silvery hair, big moustache, and spectacles made him look like a fierce helpful gnome from Grimm's fairy-tales. His picture in the municipal art gallery showed a younger man with fiery red hair. He had been an energetic reformer and came at last under the ban of one of his own reforms, retiring when his abilities were still at their height and no one could wish him to go. The final loss of this shrewd and lovable little man, with his sharply intelligent mind and his peasant dialect, impossible to follow exactly yet so vividly expressive, is mitigated only by the fact that he has long become a heroic legend."
