These fixed points aim to remind business people of a matter of utmost importance: personal contact.

Today, distances between business partners are often greater than they used to be. But, as always, personal contacts are still regarded as the best basis for business relations.

Business Class service: please check with your local Swissair office.)

Given that you want to be as relaxed and good-humoured as possible when you meet your business

So it's most useful that one can cover both shorter and longer distances so quickly and comfortably with Swissair. And that Swissair has such an extensive route network: 98 destinations worldwide, 48 of them in Europe alone.

It's hardly conceivable, therefore, that you should have to do without Swissair on a European business trip. And with Swissair you certainly don't have to do without anything at all. Neither First Class if you want to fly luxuriously, nor Business Class if you want to fly very comfortably, nor Economy Class if you want to fly at favourable fares. Because Swissair has equipped all its aircraft with three compartments. (On a few routes, however, government approval has not been given for Swissair to operate a partners. Swissair attaches importance to providing specially friendly, courteous service.

And since a meal in your business partner's favourite restaurant may be in the offing, we serve you food which pleases the palate instead of overfilling the stomach.

However, Swissair doesn't take all the credit for one of the big advantages it offers business travellers: Switzerland's situation at the heart of Europe, so very favourably placed with regard to transport facilities.

And that's something extremely important which deserves to be borne in mind: a country where you can recover from business stress probably better than anywhere else.
